

Looking for trouble.

When you think about IT consultant firms, chances are you think about computers. Most people do.

At T-Systems, we think about business. And trouble.

Businesses need us most when they're facing trouble. And they face more trouble when they're in transition.

That's when they suddenly have to change their business processes. Or create new ones. That's when the IT systems that support these business processes need to change, too. Or be created.

And that's when a lot of interesting trouble starts coming our way.

The end result may be a claims management system for rail companies. A special ERP solution for car dealers. A supply-chain portal for the dairy industry. Or a dealer helpdesk for a mobile-phone maker.

But in every project, we start with a business problem, not a computer problem.

That's the kind of trouble we like.

It's the only way to be sure that the IT system we deliver actually makes a difference for the business. And for the people running the business.

So don't be surprised if consultants from T-Systems start asking you about customer turnover, cost control or billing procedures.

They're simply looking for the right kind of trouble.
